Hosted by the University of London's Institute of Education, London Review of Education is concerned with the promotion and dissemination of informed analysis of major issues in education including pedagogy, curriculum, structures and modes of delivery, institutional effectiveness and improvement, and access and opportunity. The Editor also wishes to encourage debate on issues in related fields such as the interfaces between childcare and education, and the role of education in promoting health.

London Review of Education aims to be a well-known and highly regarded journal and a forum to which all those reflecting on the future direction of education will turn for guidance and insight. In seeking to promote debate on the major challenges facing education systems throughout the world, London Review of Education will represent within its volumes scholarly analysis written from a variety of disciplinary perspectives and points of view, including philosophy, history, psychology, sociology, economics, management and comparative studies as applied to education and its related fields.

London Review of Education will require contributions to be accessible to a wide audience. The emphasis will be away from the descriptive reporting of empirical research as an end in itself towards the publication of articles that draw on the findings of such investigations in order to illuminate a big issue of the moment and point up potential ways of dealing with it. In this way, the journal will become a vehicle for aiding understanding of current issues in education, if not actually a means for promoting change in its own right.
